United States District Court
For the Northern District of California

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

No. CR 02-0053 CRB

Plaintiff,

ORDER GRANTING MOTION TO DISMISS FOR VINDICTIVE

v.

EDWARD ROSENTHAL,

Defendant.

A jury convicted defendant Edward Rosenthal (“Rosenthal”) of three counts related to the manufacture of marijuana. Over the government’s objection, Rosenthal was sentenced to time served. Rosenthal appealed his conviction on several grounds and the government cross-appealed the sentence. The Ninth Circuit reversed the conviction solely on the ground of jury misconduct, but on all other grounds affirmed the Court’s pretrial and evidentiary rulings. The government responded to the reversal by obtaining a superseding indictment that renews the marijuana charges, but also adds new charges for tax evasion and money laundering. In open court the government explained that it was bringing the new charges because “Mr. Rosenthal, after the verdict, took to the microphone and said, I didn’t get a fair trial.” Now pending before the Court is Rosenthal’s motion to dismiss the new charges (and the renewed charges) for vindictive prosecution.

2 The government indicted Rosenthal for manufacturing and conspiring to manufacture 3 marijuana, and maintaining a place for the manufacture of marijuana, all in violation of the 4 federal Controlled Substances Act. The charges arose out of an indoor marijuana-growing 5 facility in Oakland, California.

6 The pretrial proceedings were hotly contested. The government moved in limine to 7 exclude any evidence of a “medical marijuana” defense; that is, to exclude any evidence that 8 Rosenthal was manufacturing the marijuana for medical use by others. It also moved to 9 exclude any evidence or argument aimed at jury nullification, or any evidence or argument 10 related to an entrapment-by-estoppel defense. Rosenthal moved to dismiss the indictment on 11 a plethora of grounds: (1) violation of the Commerce Clause; (2) violation of the Tenth 12 Amendment to the United States Constitution; (3) vindictive and selective prosecution; (4) 13 immunity from prosecution under a federal immunity law; and (5) entrapment-by-estoppel.
14 The Court ruled in favor of the government on all of the motions and did not permit 15 Rosenthal to present the jury with medical marijuana evidence or with an entrapment-by-16 estoppel defense.

17 The jury found Rosenthal guilty of all three-charged counts. Over the government’s 18 objection, the Court sentenced Rosenthal to one day of imprisonment. See United States v.
19 Rosenthal, 266 F.Supp.2d 1091 (N.D. Cal. 2003). The Court found that Rosenthal was 20 eligible for the safety valve that permitted a sentence below the five-year mandatory 21 minimum, and departed downward on the ground that Rosenthal believed he was not 22 violating federal law in light of his interactions with City of Oakland officials. As Rosenthal 23 had already served one day of imprisonment prior to trial, his conviction did not result in any 24 additional prison time.

25 Rosenthal nonetheless appealed his conviction, raising as error nearly all of the 26 Court’s pretrial and evidentiary rulings, as well as jury issues. The government cross-27 appealed the one-day sentence. The Ninth Circuit affirmed all of the Court’s pretrial and 28 evidentiary rulings and adopted the Court’s “reasoning in whole.” United States v.

1 Rosenthal, 454 F.3d 943, 947 (9th Cir. 2006). The court also found, however, that the 2 conviction had to be reversed because on the eve of the verdict, one of the jurors “consulted 3 with an attorney-friend who admonished the juror to follow the judge’s instructions or risk 4 ‘get[ting] into trouble.’” Id. at 947, 950. The government’s appeal of the sentence was 5 dismissed as moot, but the court noted that in light of United States v Booker, 543 U.S. 220, 6 261 (2005), it “would not be inclined to disturb the court’s reasoned analysis underlying its 7 sentencing determination.” Id. at 951 n.8.

8 The same prosecutor who prosecuted the first trial and the appeal subsequently 9 obtained a superceding indictment against Rosenthal. The superseding indictment renews 10 the original marijuana charges, but also adds new charges: specifically, four counts of tax 11 evasion and one count of money laundering. The charges arise out of the same conduct 12 which underlies the original indictment. Rosenthal moves to dismiss these new charges on 13 the ground that the circumstances of this case give rise to a presumption of vindictiveness 14 and the government has not produced evidence which dispels that presumption.

15 THE LAW OF VINDICTIVE PROSECUTION

16 In North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711 (1969), the United States Supreme Court 17 held that when a trial court imposes a more severe sentence after a defendant’s successful 18 appeal, “due process requires that the reasons for imposing such sentences upon retrial must 19 affirmatively appear so that an accused may be free, when taking an appeal, of any 20 apprehension of subsequent retaliatory or vindictive sentencing because of his appeal.” 21 United States v. Ruesga-Martinez, 534 F.2d 1367, 1368 (9th Cir. 1976) (citing Pearce, 395 22 U.S. at 725-26).

23 The Court extended Pearce to the apprehension of prosecutorial vindictiveness in 24 Blackledge v. Perry, 417 U.S. 21 (1974). The defendant, Perry, was convicted in an inferior 25 North Carolina court of a misdemeanor. Perry decided to exercise his right to a trial de novo 26 in the Superior Court. Before the de novo trial, however, the prosecution secured an 27 indictment charging Perry with a felony for the same conduct for which it had previously 28 charged a misdemeanor, resulting in an 11-months increase in sentence. “The Supreme

1 Court held that, when the circumstances ‘pose a realistic likelihood of “vindictiveness” . . .
2 due process of law requires a rule analogous to that of the Pearce case.’” Ruesga-Martinez, 3 534 F.2d at 1369 (quoting Blackledge, 417 U.S. at 27). “Thus, even though there was 4 absolutely no evidence of vindictiveness in the record, the Court held that it was 5 constitutionally impermissible for the prosecution to bring the more serious charge against 6 Perry after he had exercised his statutory right to appeal.” Ruesga-Martinez, 534 F.2d at 7 1369.

8 It is thus well-established that a presumption of vindictiveness arises when the 9 government increases the severity of the charges following a defendant’s successful appeal.
10 United States v. Motley, 655 F.2d 186, 188 (9th Cir. 1981); United States v. Shaw, 655 F.2d 11 168, 171 (9th Cir. 1981); United States v. Griffin, 617 F.2d 1342, 1346-47 (9th Cir. 1980).
12 “[I]t is the appearance of vindictiveness, rather than vindictiveness in fact, which controls.” 13 United States v. Groves, 571 F.2d 450, 453 (9th Cir. 1978). Once the presumption of 14 vindictiveness arises, the “heavy” burden shifts to the government to show that the increased 15 charges are “justified by sufficiently independent reasons to dispel any possible appearance 16 of vindictiveness.” United States v. Burt, 619 F.2d 831, 837-38 (9th Cir. 1980); see also 17 Griffin, 617 F.2d at 1346 (stating that the prosecution has a “‘heavy burden’ . . . to justify the 18 increase in severity of the alleged charges whenever it has the opportunity to reindict the 19 accused because the accused has exercised a procedural right.”); Ruesga-Martinez, 534 F.2d 20 at 1369 (“the prosecution bears a heavy burden of proving that any increase in the severity of 21 the alleged charges was not motivated by a vindictive motive”).

22 “It is irrelevant that a particular defendant exercises his statutory rights, despite his 23 fear of vindictiveness and despite lack of vindictiveness in fact in subsequent proceedings 24 instituted by the prosecutor.” United States v. DeMarco, 550 F.2d 1224, 1227 (9th Cir.
25 1977). The prophylactic rule of Pearce and Blackledge “is designed not only to relieve the 26 defendant who has asserted his right from bearing the burden from ‘upping the ante’ but also 27 to prevent chilling the exercise of such rights by other defendants who must make their 28 choices under similar circumstances in the future.” Id.

ANALYSIS

2 The government agrees that the presumption of vindictiveness applies in the 3 circumstances of this case. See Government’s Opposition at 6. Indeed, these circumstances 4 present a quintessential appearance of vindictiveness. The jury convicted Rosenthal of all 5 charged counts. The Ninth Circuit affirmed all of the Court’s pretrial and evidentiary rulings, 6 and adopted the Court’s reasoning “in whole,” but nonetheless reversed the conviction
7 because a single juror disregarded the Court’s instructions and obtained extraneous 8 information from an attorney-friend. The government responded to the reversal by 9 reindicting Rosenthal on essentially the same charges and adding four counts of tax evasion 10 and one count of money laundering. These circumstances--“upping the ante” as a result of 11 Rosenthal’s successful appeal--raise a presumption of vindictiveness. See Blackledge, 417
12 U.S. at 427.

13 The appearance of vindictiveness is especially strong because after the first trial 14 Rosenthal was sentenced to time served over the government’s vigorous objection. It is 15 unlikely that Rosenthal would receive a greater sentence if convicted again on the same 16 charges in light of North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711, 726 (1969) (“whenever a judge 17 imposes a more severe sentence upon a defendant after a new trial, the reasons for his doing 18 so must affirmatively appear”). Moreover, while the Ninth Circuit dismissed the 19 government’s appeal of Rosenthal’s sentence as moot, the court noted in dicta that the 20 sentence was reasonable. Rosenthal, 454 F.3d at 951 n.8. Indeed, the government agreed at 21 oral argument on this motion that it will not seek more than time served on the reindicted 22 marijuana charges, and it even framed the charges so that a mandatory minimum sentence 23 will not apply. The new tax and money laundering charges, however, create the risk of a 24 substantial increase in prison time and thus have a chilling effect on future defendants; the 25 reasonable observer will interpret the government’s conduct as demonstrating that if 26 defendants successfully appeal, the government will ensure that they face more severe 27 charges and more prison time the next time around. See Motley, 655 F.2d at 188.

28

1 Before analyzing the government's attempt to rebut the presumption of vindictiveness, 2 it is important to identify the reasons the government does not give for the new charges. The 3 government does not contend that it was unable to bring the tax and money laundering 4 charges in the first trial. See United States v. Gann, 732 F.2d 714, 723-24 (9th Cir. 1984)
5 (holding that district court did not abuse its discretion by finding that government rebutted 6 presumption of vindictiveness by explaining that the information necessary for the new 7 charges was not available at time of the first trial). It does not deny that at the time of the 8 first trial it had possession of the relevant tax returns and that it presented evidence in the 9 first trial that forms the basis of the money laundering count. Moreover, when the Court 10 initially proposed severing the tax and money laundering counts from the marijuana charges, 11 the government opposed severance on the ground that the evidence of the new and old counts
12 overlaps. Govt's Nov. 2, 2006 Mem. in Opp. to Severance at 2. See Ruesga-Martinez, 534
13 F.2d at 1369-70 (holding that there was no justification for government's increase of charges 14 against defendant where the prosecutor was aware of the evidence on which the new charges 15 were based before he brought the original charges); Groves, 571 F.2d at 454 (finding that 16 government did not dispel appearance of vindictiveness that arose with filing of new 17 marijuana charges when the government knew all the facts related to the marijuana charge at 18 the time it brought the original charges).

19 Nor does the government argue that it communicated to Rosenthal its intent to seek 20 such charges prior to the first trial, see United States v. Spiez, 689 F.2d 1326, 1328-29 (9th 21 Cir. 1982); Griffin, 617 F.2d at 1347 (prior to trial defendant was aware of the government's 22 ongoing investigation into unrelated charges and he had no reason to expect that an 23 indictment was not forthcoming), or that such charges are necessary to secure a conviction 24 after a mistrial was declared because of the jury's inability to reach a verdict. See United 25 States v. Thurnhuber, 572 F.2d 1307, 1311 (9th Cir. 1977). The jury convicted Rosenthal 26 after one day of deliberations.

1 The government's initial explanation for the new charges was made in open court at 2 the first proceeding after the issuance of the superseding indictment. The Court inquired as 3 to the purpose of the prosecution. The prosecutor candidly responded:

4 The purpose is this: Mr. Rosenthal, after the verdict, took to the microphone 5 and said, I didn't get a fair trial. The jury didn't know that I was growing for 6 clubs. The jurors said this was a distorted process. The government was part of it. The Court was a part of it. We would have wanted to know why he was growing the plants.

7 So I'm saying, this time around, he wants the financial side reflected, fine, let's 8 air this thing out. Let's have the whole conduct before the jury: Tax, money laundering, marijuana. And let's decide it on all the evidence.

9 Reporter's Transcript of October 25, 2006 Proceedings at 16-17. These comments reinforce 10 the appearance of vindictiveness; the inference raised is that the prosecutor brought 11 additional charges to retaliate against Rosenthal's public complaints about the fairness of the 12 first trial, and the similar concerns raised by some jurors after meeting with Rosenthal's 13 defense team.

14 Indeed, the Court immediately interpreted the prosecutor's comments as suggesting 15 that the new charges were brought in retaliation for Rosenthal's exercise of his First 16 Amendment rights. While the prosecutor was giving his explanation outlined above, the 17 Court interjected:

18 Well, wait, I would like to say several things:

19 Number one, if in fact you are --you have reindicted him because of something 20 he said after his trial, then I simply want to remind you that the First 21 Amendment to the Constitution provides the opportunity for him to speak. He can say whatever he wants to about the prosecution, and he can say whatever he wants to about the judge. That is his constitutional right. . . .

22 And if, in fact, he said things which were offensive, so be it. . . .

23 [T]o reindict him or to continue or to have a prosecution that is in some 24 measure contributing --the emphasis is on "some measure"-- the result of what he may have said, I think that would be the subject of a motion, if the parties think it's appropriate.

25 Id. at 17.

26 The prosecutor explained further:

27 [W]e have evaluated our strategy with respect to charging on only cultivation.
28 It was uncomfortable from my standpoint to be on the receiving end that the trial was deemed unfair--was said to be unfair. . . .

1 We only charged and only tried a portion of his conduct, and what we're saying 2 now is, Okay, we're going to put all of his conduct in front of the jury. We 3 want the jury to know everything about his conduct, the marijuana cultivation and what he did with the money and his tax returns. And that's the basis for the indictment.

4 Id. at 17, 18. The prosecutor's statements confirm the appearance of vindictiveness created 5 by the sequence of events: the government charged Rosenthal with additional and more 6 severe charges in retaliation for his appeal and public complaints about the fairness of the 7 trial. See United States v. P.H.E., Inc., 965 F.2d 848, 849 (10th Cir. 1992) (stating that "a 8 prosecution motivated by a desire to discourage expression protected by the First 9 Amendment is barred and must be enjoined or dismissed, irrespective of whether the 10 challenged action could possibly be found to be unlawful").

11 In opposition to Rosenthal's motion to dismiss, the government relies exclusively on 12 a declaration from the prosecutor responsible for both prosecutions. He explains that "after 13 the defendant's trial in January 2003, [he] began going forward with a financial investigation 14 of the defendant." Feb. 26, 2007 Declaration at ¶ 4. The investigation, however, was placed 15 on hold pending the outcome of the appeal. Id. After the Ninth Circuit reversed the 16 conviction, the prosecutor "began thinking of the retrial and formulating a plan. [He] was 17 committed to doing the retrial, and seeing the case to a conclusion." Id. at ¶ 6. He "acted 18 expeditiously toward superseding the existing indictment, anticipating adding tax and money 19 laundering charges." Id. The prosecutor summarized his reasons for bringing the new 20 charges as follows:

21 The Superseding Indictment reflects the government's re-evaluation of its initial 22 litigation/charging strategy. It also reflects, in part, our consideration of the 23 widespread, post-verdict criticism of the trial as having been unfair, insofar as evidence was excluded regarding the defendant supplying marijuana for eventual use by alleged medicinal users.

24 Id. at ¶ 9.

25 This latest explanation also does not satisfy the government's heavy burden of 26 dispelling the presumption of vindictiveness. The government's commencement of its 27 investigation into the tax and money laundering charges shortly after the first trial is 28 consistent with the evidence suggesting that the new charges were brought in retaliation for

1 Rosenthal's post-verdict complaints about the fairness of the trial. The government decided 2 to pursue such charges only after it was "made uncomfortable" by Rosenthal's public attacks 3 on the fairness of the prosecution.

4 Moreover, while the government contends that the new charges reflect its re-5 evaluation of its litigation/trial strategy, it is apparent that it decided to re-evaluate its 6 strategy in response to Rosenthal's (and his supporters') public criticism of the trial. The 7 prosecutor readily admits that the new charges reflect the government's "consideration of the 8 widespread, post-verdict criticism of the trial as having been unfair." Feb. 26, 2007 9 Declaration at ¶ 9. The government asserts that it has had a change of heart and "agree[s] 10 with Rosenthal that at a retrial the jury should hear the full story of Rosenthal's marijuana 11 growing operation." Government's Opposition at 1-2. If the government actually agreed 12 with Rosenthal, however, it could have (1) dropped the prosecution all together, or (2) agreed 13 not to oppose Rosenthal's efforts to have evidence of his sale to medical marijuana clubs 14 admitted at the retrial. The government, however, did neither; instead, it added tax and 15 money laundering charges that ensure that Rosenthal will go to jail if convicted. See Motley, 16 655 F.2d at 189 (holding that the government's decision to simplify its case justified its post-17 trial reformulation of the charges to exclude the more complicated counts, but did not justify 18 the increased severity of the charges; the government could have simplified the trial without 19 increasing the severity of the charges).

20 A reasonable observer would interpret the government's conduct as warning: "Okay 21 Mr. Rosenthal, if you want to attack the trial as unfair, and put us in the uncomfortable 22 position of being criticized in the press and by the jurors, we are going to show the jury and 23 the public that you are a tax fraud and a money launderer." In other words, the government's 24 deeds--and words--create the perception that it added the new charges to make Rosenthal 25 look like a common criminal and thus dissipate the criticism heaped on the government after 26 the first trial. The problem with this perception, however, is that it will discourage 27 defendants from exercising their First Amendment right to criticize their prosecutions and 28 their statutory right to appeal their convictions. If they do, and they are successful, the 1 government will punish them by bringing more serious charges. See DeMarco, 550 F.2d at 2 1227 (stating that Blackledge’s prophylactic rule is designed “to prevent chilling the exercise

3 of such rights by other defendants who must make their choices under similar circumstances 4 in the future”).

5 Finally, the prosecutor’s assertion that he “was committed to doing the retrial, and 6 seeing the case to a conclusion,” Feb. 26, 2007 Decl. at ¶ 6, further enhances--rather than 7 dispels--the appearance of vindictiveness. The government knew that a retrial of the original 8 charges would likely result in a sentence of time served; thus, the most the government
9 would accomplish with a retrial is having a felony conviction. Moreover, the legal position 10 advocated by the government in the first trial--that evidence that Rosenthal was 11 manufacturing the marijuana for sale to medical clubs was irrelevant to the federal charges-- 12 was accepted by this Court and the appellate court; the government’s position is now the law 13 of the Ninth Circuit. The government’s decision to nevertheless “see the case to conclusion” 14 contributes to the perception that the government is retaliating against Rosenthal for his 15 criticism of the trial and his success in having his conviction reversed.

16 The government does not cite a single case that suggests the government may “up the 17 ante” after a criminal defendant’s successful appeal in order to rebut the defendant’s 18 widespread public criticism of the trial. Indeed, the cases the government cites either do not 19 involve claims of vindictive prosecution, or involve claims in the pretrial setting, that is, 20 cases in which the presumption of vindictiveness does not apply. See United States v.
21 Goodwin, 457 U.S. 368, 382-84 (1982) (holding that no presumption of vindictiveness arises 22 when the government increases the severity of the charges against the defendant before he 23 has been tried); see also United States v. Gallegos-Curiel, 681 F.2d 1164, 1167 (9th Cir.
24 1982) (“cases involving increased charges or punishments after trial are to be sharply 25 distinguished from cases in which the prosecution increases charges in the course of pretrial 26 proceedings”). As the government concedes, this is the rare case in which the presumption 27 applies. And it is a case in which the government has failed to satisfy its burden of rebutting 28 the presumption.

1 The Court does not doubt the subjective good faith of the prosecutor. He has been 2 candid as to his reasons for adding the new charges; indeed, the Court has relied on the 3 prosecutor’s own statements--in his declaration and in open court--in finding that the 4 presumption of vindictiveness has not been rebutted. The Court has given no weight to the 5 disputed affidavit of J. David Nick, and although the Court ordered the government to 6 produce, in camera, the government’s charging memoranda, the Court has not relied on any 7 statements in those memoranda in reaching its decision. The government has not argued that 8 anything in the memoranda is additional evidence that the Court should consider.

9 The relevant question, however, is not whether the prosecutor subjectively believes 10 that it is appropriate to bring the new charges. See Groves, 571 F.2d at 453 (“We need not 11 find that the prosecutor acted in bad faith or that he maliciously sought the marihuana 12 indictment”); see also Ruesaga-Martinez, 534 F.2d at 1369 (dismissing for vindictive 13 prosecution and stating that the court does “not intend by [its] opinion to impugn the actual 14 motives of the United States Attorney’s office in any way”). The dispositive question is 15 whether the government has met its burden of identifying intervening or independent 16 objective facts that dispel the presumption of vindictiveness. The Court finds that it has not.

<sup>1</sup>At oral argument the defense argued that under United States v. Motley, 655 F.2d 186 (9th Cir. 1982), the Court should, or at least could, dismiss the old charges along with the new. Motley does not support defendant’s argument. There the government had substituted all new charges for the old charges and thus the court could not strike only some portions of the indictment without substituting “judicial for prosecutorial discretion for which charges to bring.” Id. at 190. Moreover, the court noted that the government was free to bring a new indictment that reasserted the old charges. Id.
